Angiogenesis and anti angiogenesis in hematological

A novel finding regarding the role of angiogenesis in hematological malignancies, which accounts for many clinical observations as well as the apparent independence of these tumors on marrow vascularity, is presented. The information presented in this review will facilitate the design of future clinical trials using antiangiogenic agents for the treatment of hematological malignancies and will provide a basis for the design of experiments undertaken to define the mechanisms involved

New blood vessel formation (angiogenesis) is not only essential for the growth of solid tumors but there is also emerging evidence that progression of hematological malignancies like multiple myeloma, acute leukemias, and myeloproliferative neoplasms, also depends on new blood vessel formation.

A Review of Angiogenesis and Anti Angiogenic Therapy in

Tumor angiogenesis is currently not only a concept but has also become a rationale for the therapeutic use of both old and new drugs that might affect new blood vessel formation. There is growing evidence that angiogenesis is as important in hematologic malignancies as it is in solid tumors. Both myeloid and lymphoid disorders may be
